When 14-year-old Kevin Richardson – member of the exonerated 5 entered New York City's Central Park on a spring evening in 1989, he had a child's concerns. But the eighth-grade student was arrested on his way home that night, and, with four other Black and Hispanic teens, faced a nightmarish journey through the criminal justice system. The youths, known as the Central Park Five, spent day after day, year after year, in custody for a brutal crime they did not commit.
